INTRODUCTION

The Highlander Folk School Audio Collection, 1953-1963, was made possible by Myles Horton, then director of the Highlander Folk School, who allowed the State Library and Archives to copy the original audio tapes.

The materials in this finding aid measures .84 linear feet. There are no restrictions on the materials. Copies of tapes can be made for individual and scholarly use. However, for commercial use or where there may be potential copyright infringement, the user must obtain permission for the use from the Highlander School and the interviewee.

This finding aid is a listing of audio recordings of labor and civil rights conferences, workshops, and panel discussions held under the auspices of the Highlander Folk School between 1953 and 1963.

The recordings have been arranged chronologically. For each recording, a summary of topics covered, the persons speaking, and approximate number of minutes for each session is given. A name index has been included to identify, whenever possible, the persons speaking on each of the recordings. A separate index has been included listing the persons, on three of the recordings, to whom Myles Horton, director of the school, dictated letters.
SCOPE AND CONTENT

The Highlander Folk School Audio Collections, ca. 250 audio discs or 154 hours of listening time, contains records of dictated correspondence; labor meetings; panel discussions and reports on integration; and workshops on the United Nations, the student sit-in movement, citizenship schools, and voter registration.

The Highlander Folk School, located in Grundy County, Tennessee, at the southern tip of the Cumberland Mountains, was the leading training center for southern labor and civil rights leaders for nearly three decades (1932-1961). In 1961, the school’s charter was revoked by the state of Tennessee for irregularities in its operation as a non-profit organization. Within a few weeks, the school reopened in Knoxville, Tennessee, under another charter granted to the Highlander Research and Education Center. The audio discs in this collection were copied from the original tapes made at Highlander during its last eight years as a “Folk School” and its first two years as a “Research and Education Center”. For purposes of brevity, the entire collection is referred to as the Highlander Folk School Audio Collection.

The great bulk of this collection deals with the integration movement. The growth and development of the integration movement in the years between 1953 and 1963 can be traced through the audio collection as students who have participated in the struggle discuss such topics as: the 1953 Supreme Court ruling on school desegregation; the role of various organizations in the movement – National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Congress of Racial Equality, Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Southern Regional Council, etc.; the role of Martin Luther King, Roy Wilkins, and other leaders in the fight; the impact of sit-ins, wade-ins, stand-ins, etc. upon both the white and Negro communities; the role of the white liberal in the movement; non-violence as a force for action in the struggle; the threat of the Black Muslims to the entire integration movement; voter registration drives, citizenship schools, and political pressure to obtain the goals of the movement; and leadership responsibilities of the younger members of the movement.

The remainder of the collection is made up of labor meetings, conferences dealing with world affairs, dictated correspondence by Myles Horton, and background material dealing with the Highlander Folk School.
